This remodel took full advantage of the strong bones and distinctive architecture of an impressive custom-built home in Ann Arbor's Saginaw Hills. The goals: modernize its 1980s flair, create a chef's kitchen with effortless entertaining flow, and layer in rich materials and texture.

The transformation began at the front door, where custom metal-and-glass units now flood the entry with natural light and frame a sweeping view of the woodland beyond. A redesigned stairwell pairs metal and wood for a striking architectural statement, complemented by new hardwood floors throughout. Both fireplaces were reimagined with a sleek plaster finish, while the powder room now stuns with a "floating" quartz vanity and moody ambiance.

The most dramatic changes came in the kitchen and side entry. Walls were removed to create an open drop zone, a custom fabricated metal-and-glass walk-in pantry was added, and a showstopping quartzite waterfall island now anchors the space. The result is a modern and serene interior that feels seamlessly connected to the surrounding woodland environment.
